

Each Rahkshi carries within it a part of Makuta's essence called a Kraata. These slug like creatures have the power to infect any Kanohi mask they touch. Kraata evolve through six stages, making the Rahkshi faster and more powerful as they change.

Stage 1

A first stage Kraata is driven completely by instinct. With no real mind of its own, it slithers through the deepest, darkest places of Mata Nui, eternally compelled to seek out masks to infect.

Stage 4

A fourth stage Kraata can evade traps and even withstand the sunlight for a short while. These Kraata are shrewd enough to know of Matoran and are known to spring from ambush in an attempt to infect a mask.

Stage 2

A second stage Kraata has little intelligence to speak of, but knows enough to flee from danger and avoid the light. Kraata at this stage often make their homes in the marshy depths of the Le-Wahi swamp.

Stage 5

A fifth stage Kraata has developed its powers and knows how and when to use them best. These Kraata know the Makuta's will and actively seek out Matoran masks to infect.

Stage 3

A third stage Kraata is capable of evading capture and defending itself with its powers if cornered. Many of these Kraata lurk in the crevices of Mata Nui's caves and tunnels, waiting to infect the masks of passing creatures.

Stage 6

A sixth stage Kraata is fully aware of its mission and in control of its powers. Kraata at this stage are in constant communion with the Makuta and carry out his bidding with cunning and skill.

Kraata have plagued Mata Nui since before the arrival of the Toa. They can be found slithering in the shadows, spreading the darkness of Makuta wherever they go. For years, the Turanga have hunted them in secret, hiding them safety away in stasis tubes.
